"For God and Country" is the motto on the coat of arms of Loyola University's medical unit, General Hospital 108. The unit, which saw action in France during World War I, is one of the few in the country with its own authorized coat of arms, according to Col. George T. Jordan, unit director. This group will staff an overseas hospital of 1,000 beds when it is called for active duty in the near future. In an extreme emergency, the Loyola University medical unit will be able to handle a hospital twice as large.

Lt. Col. Stanley Fahlstrom is chief of the medical service of General Hospital 108. The surgical section is under Lt. Col. William Vynalek. The dental corps is directed by Major Charles Grandstaff.

In addition to the 68 commissioned men in the Loyola University medical unit, there will be 105 nurses under the direction of Lt. Sara Abrams. These nurses have the rank of second lieutenant.

The group is completed by 500 enlisted men who are being supplied by the regular army. These soldiers rank from privates to sergeants and serve as orderlies, male nurses, dental hygienists, ambulance drivers, chauffeurs, dieticians, typists, buglers, bakers, carpenters, and electricians.
